‘If we accept with comparatively ready acquiescence that our thoughts are not entirely independent, we are, nonetheless, peculiarly resistant to the idea that our emotions are not altogether our own.’

Although Brennan is surely correct in identifying the tenacity of our commitment to our feelings as our own, history shows that locating feeling has always been a problematic task. In the seventeenth century, a sore body part might induce a corresponding discomfort in another bodily region; in the eighteenth century, Hume wrote of the passions as highly contagious, passing ‘with the greatest facility from one person to another’. Feelings don’t readily stay in place: they wander, and get passed around.

This day-length colloquium seeks to investigate emotional transmission in the nineteenth century. In this period, the traditional location for ‘higher’ feelings – the soul – was challenged by theories of physiology which posited instead reflex actions and the localization of brain functions. At the same time, literature was pervaded by new anxieties about the consequences of too much feeling, and of feelings insufficiently under control. From Charles Bell’s idea that weeping might be produced of sympathy between the lachrymal gland and internal organs, to Gustave Le Bon’s accounts of the spread of panic among crowds, the contagion of emotions has called into question the composition of the body, the individual autonomy of feelings, and the possibility of an emotional self.
